Feminisms in American Studies in/and Crisis: Where Do We Go From Here?

Online: 29 April 2021

Understanding feminist scholarship as a form of critical practice necessitates the continuous critical self-scrutiny of one's field, one's archive, one's canon, and one's own situatedness and positionality. The question of who speaks, and who speaks for whom, in feminist scholarship requires thorough inquiry because un/marked universalisms have always been written into Western discourses of identity, agency, and, not least of all, woman*hood.

We, the Steering Committee of the EAAS Women's Network, would like to take our 2021 conference as an opportunity to take stock of feminist scholarship in (European) American studies, and we invite contributions (research papers, position papers, meditations, and musings) that reflect on, interrogate, and rethink cultural production, philosophy, and lived experiences with respect to conceptions of feminism as a critical practice of scholarship from intersectional perspectives.

Although feminism has been conceived most broadly as an heiress to the women's liberation and suffrage movements, its liberatory practices have, time and again, unveiled that other forms of oppression and inequality cannot be remedied by or subsumed under the feminist project. For instance, in regard to the ongoing climate crisis and the latest health crisis caused by the COVID-19 pandemic, the particular inequalities and vulnerabilities of women* and trans* and non-binary people have especially come to the fore. The formation of nationalist, (alt)right, racist, and xenophobic 'feminisms' have been gaining popular and populist support in Europe and the United States, deploying racist and racializing tropes firmly rooted in anti-Black and anti-Muslim racism; and the backlash against gender studies is often based on simplistic (mis)understandings of and hostility towards deconstructivist and queer approaches.

In response to these challenges and crises, this conference is interested in (revisionist) readings of U.S.-American feminist history, interrogations of past and current feminist theories and practices, grievances of and towards (particular) feminist positions, national and global challenges to feminist activism, and utopian visions. We invite contributions on all forms of cultural production, the production of knowledge, activism in the academy, critical pedagogy, the history of science, and the history of ideas, including but not limited to the following:

- feminist and intersectional perspectives on
 - forced migration
 - healthcare and the global care chain
 - climate justice

- the (neoliberal) academy
- feminism and political movements: suffrage and abolition, feminism and the civil rights movement, women's rights and the (alt)right, women's marches, the Pussyhat Project, Black Lives Matter
- feminist and intersectional pedagogies and methodologies in American studies classrooms
- feminist and intersectional activism in/and research
- intersectionality and critiques of power: feminisms, post-colonial and de-colonial studies, critical posthumanism, etc.
- feminist "declarations of whiteness" (Ahmed) and critical whiteness studies; (critiques of) white fragility (DiAngelo); liberal feminism and white allyship in academia and beyond
- intersectional perspectives on sex and gender in the sciences and medicine
- intersection of race, sex, gender, sexuality, and dis/ability in positions of power and politics
